Description:

A fine example of Nicolas Delamare's map of Paris during the reigns of King Henry IV and King Louis XIII (1589-1643), one of his ground-breaking series of eight maps illustrating the historical development of the French capital.

The present map comes from the first edition, first volume of Nicolas Delamare's La Traité de la Police (Paris, 4 vols., 1705-38), considered to be the most influential legal treatise produced in early modern France. It was the first detailed history of law enforcement ever published, and details the development of the subject throughout the history of Paris. In order to illustrate the size and nature of the city during different historical periods, Delamare painstakingly consulted a variety of published and archival sources in order to construct a series of eight maps that progressively depict the evolution of Paris from Roman times up to 1700. All considered, this map represents a fascinating glimpse into Medieval Paris, which is today long lost, save for the survival of a handful of Gothic buildings.

Maps from Delmare's Paris map series rarely appear separately on the market.
