Description:

A detailed county map of Rutland prepared by Robert Morden in 1695 and most likely printed as part of the 1722 edition of Camden's Britannia. The map of this small county is attractively designed, with forests, lakes, and towns all shown, and larger cities depicted pictorially. The map includes two cartouches and a decorative compass rose.

The map shows the historical county of Rutland, subdivided according to its hundreds. This tiny county, only eighteen by seventeen miles, is the smallest historical county of Britain. The prominent cities of "Okeham" and Uppingham are shown in intriguing detail. While Rutland Water is not visible on the map, which was created with the damming of the Gwash in 1975. Burley is shown on its eponymous hill.

Parts of the adjacent counties of Leicester, Lincolnshire, and Northamptonshire are all shown. In all, this is an attractive and well designed Morden county map.

The map and atlas were sold by the partners A. Swale and A. Churchil.
