Description:

This early and highly detailed map, titled "Railroad and County Map of Idaho" by George F. Cram, provides an intricate representation of Idaho's railroads, towns, cities, mountain ranges, and county configurations, circa 1888.

The map showcases the burgeoning infrastructure of Idaho in the late 19th century, revealing the prominence of railroads and their importance in connecting towns and cities across the state. With early county configurations displayed, it offers valuable insight into the development and organization of Idaho's administrative divisions during this period.

In addition to the railroads and counties, the map highlights various geographical features, including rivers, mountain ranges, and mining areas. It also includes Native American names and locations, providing a glimpse into the cultural and historical context of Idaho at the time.
