Description:

John Cary's A New Map of the Circle of Austria, From the Latest Authorities, published in London in 1801, offers an astute representation of Austria, standing as a notable example of early-19th-century British cartography. The map showcases a detailed landscape of the Austrian region, reflective of Cary's cartographic practice.

This map outlines the political boundaries of Austria, locating key cities, towns, and geographic landmarks with precision. Cary's dedication to accuracy is evident in his reliance on the latest authoritative sources of the time, indicating a commitment to providing a comprehensive and current depiction of Austria's terrain.

Historically, the map is situated in a critical phase of European history, the start of the 19th century. This was a period marked by the Napoleonic Wars and the reshaping of the political map of Europe. The delineation of Austria, a significant power player, provides insights into the regional dynamics of the time.

A New Map of the Circle of Austria, From the Latest Authorities stands as a noteworthy example of John Cary's influential work in the field of cartography. This map not only illuminates the geographical composition of Austria but also underscores the geopolitical intricacies of early 19th-century Europe. It is a testament to the interplay of cartography and history, illustrating the value of maps as historical documents.
