Description:

The First Ohio Map in an American Folio Atlas

Nice example of Carey's map of Ohio, one of the most influential early maps of Ohio and the first large format map of Ohio to appear in an atlas.

The map illustrates Ohio 11 years after it gained statehood on February 19, 1803, and shortly after several battles were fought on land and in Lake Erie, during the War of 1812. On September 10, 1813, the Battle of Lake Erie, one of the major battles, took place in Lake Erie near Put-in-Bay, Ohio.

At the far northwest, a large area shown as "Indian" includes a large section of Southeastern Michigan, including parts of the future suburban Detroit and Ann Arbor.

The map is illustrated as Plate VII in Smith's Mapping of Ohio and receives several pages of discussion.

The State of Ohio with part of Upper Canada, &c. [and Part of Michigan Territory within Ohio]

Carey spent two paragraphs in the introductory notes to the 1814 edition of his atlas discussing this map.

Engraved by Samuel Lewis, Smith notes that the map is one of the first to depict the early counties of Ohio (23) and contains many interesting inaccuracies, Deerfield County (located above Hamilton & Clermont), never existed. Gallia County is Gallipolis and Columbiana is Columbia. Lewis paid particular attention to the Indian Wars between 1790 and 1794 and the War of 1812. Carey had been criticized for his early depiction of this area. However, Fort Adams and Fort Recovery are still depicted too far to the West, outside of the State boundary, and Perry's victory in Lake Erie is referred to as Pudding Bay.

Carey's General Atlas published in 1814 was the first American Atlas to be offered for sale with outline hand coloring on the maps.
