Description:

Charting the eastern coastline of the Indian subcontinent, The Coast of India, from Point Gordeware to the Ganges, Comprehending part of the Coast of Golconda, the Coasts of Orissa and Bengal, with the Mouth of Hoogly River delineates the maritime geography of the late 18th century. Published by the eminent firm of Laurie & Whittle in London, in 1794, this significant chart presents an unparalleled, accurate depiction of the regions from Golconda to Bengal, including the estuarine complex of the revered Ganges River.

During the late 18th century, an era marked by burgeoning imperial interests and expanding maritime commerce, accurate navigation charts were in high demand. British maritime enterprises, most notably the East India Company, had cemented a strong presence in the Indian subcontinent, making the region a hub of trade and cultural exchange. In this historical context, the work of Laurie & Whittle - well-known for their precise, detailed cartographic productions - gained notable importance.

This chart, with its distinctive features, stands as an emblem of the era's navigational practices. The inclusion of six coastal profiles and hundreds of soundings reflects the meticulous marine surveys undertaken at the time. The chart also highlights the significant hydrographic detail of the Hoogly River - a key tributary of the Ganges River and a critical navigational route during this period, demonstrating its strategic importance for maritime activities.

The depiction of the vast Ganges delta, where numerous branches of the river meet the Bay of Bengal, exemplifies the chart's geographical accuracy and level of detail. Furthermore, the representation of the diverse coastal regions - spanning from the historic region of Golconda in the south to Bengal in the north
