The Salesians of Don Bosco (Salesian Society) is a Roman Catholic Latin Rite religious institute founded by Saint John Bosco to help poor children during the Industrial Revolution.

In 1845, Don John Bosco founded a night school for boys in Turin in Italy, followed by several similar schools. By 1857, he had established rules for his helpers, which became the Rule of the Society of St. Francis de Sales, which Pope Pius IX approved in 1873. The Society grew rapidly, with houses established in France and Argentina within a year of the Society's formal recognition. Its official print organ, the Salesian Bulletin, was first published in 1877.

Over the next decade the Salesians expanded into Austria, Britain, Spain, and several countries in South America.
