Description:

Decorative map of Ireland created by Thomas Kitchin, a prominent English cartographer and engraver, and was published in London in 1779.

The map covers the entire island of Ireland, from the northernmost point at Malin Head to the southernmost point at Mizen Head. It includes detailed information about the physical geography of the region, including the locations of mountains, rivers, lakes, and coastal features. The map offers an accurate depiction of these physical features, which were based on the latest scientific and cartographic knowledge of the time.

In addition to its geographical information, the map also includes a wealth of political and cultural information about Ireland in the late 18th century.
