Description:

Fine example of Jean Baptiste d'Anville's map covering a section of Chinese Tartary.

The map provides a detailed depiction of the portion of Tartary including the provinces of Leao tong and Kirin Oula, as well as the country of Cartchin and other areas inhabited by the Mongous people.

One of the most notable features of d'Anville's map is its level of detail. The map includes a wealth of information about the geography of the region, including the locations of cities, rivers, and other geographical features. D'Anville also includes notes on the map that provide additional information about the region, such as the names of tribes and the locations of important roads and trading routes.

Another striking aspect of d'Anville's map is its level of accuracy. At the time that the map was created, much of the information about the region of Tartary was based on hearsay and speculation. However, d'Anville was able to draw on a wide range of sources in order to create a map that was as accurate as possible. This included using information from Jesuit missionaries who had traveled to the region, as well as data from other European and Chinese sources.

Kirin Oula, which is also known as Jilin in modern-day China, is a province located in the northeast of the country. It is known for its beautiful natural scenery, with forests, mountains, and rivers that are popular with tourists and outdoor enthusiasts. The province is also home to a number of ethnic minority groups, including the Manchu and the Korean, who have their own unique cultures and traditions.

Le Pays de Cartchin, or Inner Mongolia, is another province located in the northeast of China. It is a vast and sparsely populated region, with a predominantly grassy landscape that is home to a number of different animal species. The province is also known for its rich history and cultural heritage, with a number of important archaeological sites that provide insight into the region's past.

The other quartiers des Mongous, or regions inhabited by the Mongol people, are located in various parts of Tartary. These regions are known for their nomadic lifestyle, with many of the people living in tents and moving around the countryside in search of grazing land for their herds of animals. T
