Description:

Fine example of Jean Baptiste d'Anville's map covering a section of Chinese Tartary.

The map provides a detailed depiction of the portion of Tartary including regions occupied by the Yup, Ilan-Hala and ancient Mantcheou.

One of the most notable features of d'Anville's map is its level of detail. The map includes a wealth of information about the geography of the region, including the locations of cities, rivers, and other geographical features. D'Anville also includes notes on the map that provide additional information about the region, such as the names of tribes and the locations of important roads and trading routes.

Another striking aspect of d'Anville's map is its level of accuracy. At the time that the map was created, much of the information about the region of Tartary was based on hearsay and speculation. However, d'Anville was able to draw on a wide range of sources in order to create a map that was as accurate as possible. This included using information from Jesuit missionaries who had traveled to the region, as well as data from other European and Chinese sources.

One of the key features of the map is its depiction of the Tartares Yupi and Tartares Ilan-Hala, two groups of nomadic people who inhabited the region of Chinese Tartary. The map shows the territories controlled by these groups, as well as their settlements and camps. In addition to the Tartares Yupi and Tartares Ilan-Hala, the map also includes information about the ancient lands of the Mantcheou. This was a powerful empire that ruled over much of China and Central Asia in the past, and its remnants could still be found in the region of Chinese Tartary in the early 18th century.
