Description:

This is an uncommon late 17th-century map depicting part of the Lombardy region of Italy. The map is based on the work of Giacomo Cantelli da Vignola, an Italian cartographer who introduced a distinctive style in cartography that was followed and developed by notable cartographers such as Vincenzo Coronelli. The map was published in Rome as part of Giacomo de Rossi's world atlas "Mercurio Geografico" and is dated 1680. The map was engraved by Giorgio Widman, a skilled Italian engraver who contributed to several important atlases of the time.

Cantelli's style in cartography was characterized by highly detailed engravings that incorporated a range of geographic and topographic features, including mountains, rivers, forests, and cities, as well as intricate embellishments and decorative elements. This style was highly influential and contributed to the development of more sophisticated mapping techniques in the following centuries.

Overall, this map represents a significant historical document that provides valuable insight into the topography, geography, and cultural significance of the Lombardy region during the late 17th century, as well as the advancements in cartography during this time period.
