Description:

This 1893 Rand McNally map of Wisconsin serves as a detailed snapshot of the state's geographical and political landscape on the cusp of significant changes. Published in Chicago, this document captures the region prior to the establishment of Iron County, providing a unique perspective on Wisconsin's evolution.

The 1893 Rand McNally map situates itself in a crucial period in Wisconsin's history, during the last decade of the 19th century. The state was undergoing rapid industrialization and urbanization, with an influx of immigrants and an expanding railway system. At this time, Wisconsin's lumber and dairy industries were growing exponentially, significantly shaping its economy and land use.

This map, rich in detail, offers a clear depiction of Wisconsin's counties, towns, rail networks, and key geographical features as they existed at that time. The absence of Iron County, which would soon emerge in 1893 as a result of the region's burgeoning iron ore mining industry, underscores the map's historical
