Description:

Herman Moll's map of the northwestern part of Germany, published in London in 1729, offers a detailed view of the region during the early 18th century.

This map includes the dominions of the Electors of Brunswick, Lunenburg, and Cologne, along with Westphalia, the Duchy of Holstein, Jülich, and others. It also illustrates the Landgraviate of Hessen Cassel and the bishoprics of Münster and Osnabrück.

Noteworthy here is the historical context of the map. During this period, Germany was not a unified nation but a complex mosaic of independent kingdoms, duchies, bishoprics, and other territories. The Electors referred to were important figures within the Holy Roman Empire, who held the privilege of participating in the election of the emperor.

Moll's maps are highly regarded for their aesthetic quality as well as their accuracy. This particular map would likely have been appreciated not just for its practical value, but also as a work of art. Detailed and carefully rendered, it provides valuable insight into the political and geographical landscape of northwestern Germany during the early 18th century.
