No Riverside or Imperial County

San Diego and Part of San Bernardino Counties, published by Rand McNally & Company in Chicago in 1892, provides a scarce and detailed view of these regions within Southern California. Featuring numerous small towns, railroads, rivers, mountains, Indian villages, railway stations, mines, and other details, it is notable as one of the few separate maps of this region to appear in a commercial atlas during this period.

The late 19th century was a time of significant growth and transformation in Southern California. With the development of railroads and the discovery of valuable minerals, regions like San Diego and San Bernardino saw an influx of settlers and economic activity. The absence of Riverside or Imperial County on the map reflects the geographical and administrative landscape of the time, before these counties were fully established.

The map's rich detailing makes it a valuable resource for understanding the historical geography of the area. The depiction of Indian villages, railway stations, and mines offers insights into the diverse communities, transportation networks, and economic activities that characterized the region. The inclusion of natural features like rivers and mountains adds to the depth of information, portraying the varied landscapes that shaped human settlement and development.
