Washington, the racecourse was situated on a portion of The Grove farm on Charleston's upper peninsula. It quickly established itself as a premier venue for horse racing, a sport that was both a pastime and a symbol of status among the Southern elite.

The Washington Race Course was readied in time for its inaugural event during Race Week in February 1792, featuring the main event, the Jockey Club Purse, which was a series of four heat races. Throughout the early 19th century, the racecourse became the social hub of Charleston during the racing season, which culminated annually with Race Week. The event attracted various members of society, from the plantation aristocracy to merchants and visitors. It became a melting pot of sorts, where different classes mingled, though there were clear demarcations of social status and segregation.

The Washington Race Course was also the site of slave auctions were conducted at the track.

The track was used until the the late 19th Century, at which time it was deeded to the Charleston Library Society. It was the location of the South Carolina Inter-State and West Indian Exposition. After the exposition, the land was sold the land to the City of Charleston. The track is now the site of Hampton Park.
